ORDER

Defendant Darryl Taylor has filed a motion seeking compassionate release under § 603 of the First Step Act of 2018, which is codified at 18 U.S.C. § 3582(c)(1)(A). Dkt. 146. He has also filed a motion for oral argument on his motion for compassionate release. Dkt. 148. For the reasons explained below, his motions are DENIED.

I.       Background

In 2009, Mr. Taylor was sentenced to a total of 444 months in prison and 3 years of supervised release after a jury found him guilty of two counts of armed robbery affecting interstate commerce, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1951(a); and two counts of brandishing a firearm during and in relation to a crime of violence, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 924(c). Dkt. 63. The sentence consisted of concurrent 24-month sentences for the two armed robbery counts, a consecutive 120-month sentence for the first § 924 count, and a consecutive 300-month sentence for the second § 924 count. Id. Under the law as it existed at the time, the first § 924 count carried a mandatory minimum sentence of 120 months and the second § 924 count carried a mandatory minimum sentence of 300 months, each mandatorily consecutive to each other and all other counts. See 18 U.S.C. § 924(c)(1) (effective Oct. 6, 2006 to Dec. 20, 2018). Thus, the lowest sentence the Court could have imposed was 420 months (or 35 years). The BOP lists his anticipated release date, with good-conduct time included, as October 18, 2040. <https://www.bop.gov/inmateloc/> (last visited July 22, 2024).

Mr. Taylor filed his first motion for compassionate release arguing that he established extraordinary and compelling reasons for his release because (1) a change in the law has created a disparity between the sentence he is currently serving and the sentence he would receive today, and (2) a combination of the length of his sentence, his age at the time of sentencing, and his rehabilitation. Dkts. 98, 104, 133. The Court denied his motion finding that the Court was precluded by United States v. Thacker, 4 F.4th 569 (7th Cir. 2021) from finding that a change in the law may create an extraordinary and compelling reason for release and that none of his other argued reasons, individually or together, establish extraordinary and compelling reasons for release. Dkt. 133.

Mr. Taylor has filed a second motion for compassionate release. Dkt. 146. Mr. Taylor once again argues that he establishes extraordinary and compelling reasons for compassionate release because (1) there is a gross disparity created by a change in the law between the sentence he is serving and the sentence he would receive today, and (2) a combination of other reason demonstrates extraordinary and compelling reasons for release based on the length of his sentence, his youth at the time of his offense, his family support and release plan, and his substantial rehabilitation. Dkt. 147. He also argues that recently updated sentencing guidelines permit the Court to alter its prior finding on whether there are extraordinary and compelling reasons for Mr. Taylor's release. Dkt. 147. The United States has filed opposition to the motion, dkt. 153, and Mr. Taylor filed a reply, dkt. 158. The motions are now ripe.

II. Legal Background

We reach back into history to explain the context of the issues raised by Mr. Taylor in his motion for compassionate release based on an alleged disparity between current sentencing law and that in effect at the time of his conviction. Prior to 1984, "the Federal Government employed in criminal cases a system of indeterminate sentencing" with wide sentencing boundaries for trial judges who exercised "almost unfettered discretion" Tapia v. United States, 564 U.S. 319, 323 (2011) (quoting Mistretta v. United States, 488 U.S. 361, 363 (1989)). This model fell into disfavor due to doubts that existing prison programs were able to rehabilitate offenders and because of large sentencing disparities among similarly situated defendants. Id. at 324.

These concerns led Congress to enact the Sentencing Reform Act of 1984, "overhaul[ing] federal sentencing practices." Id. at 325. The Sentencing Reform Act established the United States Sentencing Commission, which was directed to promulgate sentencing guidelines that would replace indeterminate sentencing and parole with "a range of determinate sentences for categories of offenses and defendants." Id. (quoting Mistretta, 488 U.S. at 368). Congress also specified in the new statute that a "court may not modify a term of imprisonment once it has been imposed" with certain exceptions. 18 U.S.C. § 3582(c). One such exception allowed a court to "reduce the term of imprisonment . . . after considering the factors set forth in section 3553(a) to the extent that they are applicable, if it finds that . . . extraordinary and compelling reasons warrant such a reduction." 18 U.S.C. § 3582(c)(1)(A), (A)(i). As enacted in 1984, the Sentencing Reform Act permitted such a reduction only "upon motion of the Director of the Bureau of Prisons." 18 U.S.C. § 3582(c)(1)(A) (Effective: Nov. 2, 2002 to Dec. 20, 2018). These motions, sometimes referred to as "compassionate release" motions, became the means by which defendants sought a sentence reduction that would result in immediate release.

Congress also instructed the Sentencing Commission to promulgate "general policy statements regarding . . . the appropriate use of" such sentence reductions. 28 U.S.C. § 994(a)(2). Accordingly, the Sentencing Commission promulgated U.S.S.G. § 1B1.13 describing circumstances under which a court may find an extraordinary and compelling reason for a sentence reduction. Later, Congress amended § 3582(c)(1)(A) as part of the First Step Act of 2018, which amendment, for the first time, permitted motions for a sentence reduction based on extraordinary and compelling reasons to be filed by defendants. 18 U.S.C. § 3582(c)(1)(A) (Effective: December 21, 2018). But the Sentencing Commission's opportunity to amend § 1B1.13 was delayed due to the fact that shortly after the enactment of the First Step Act the Sentencing Commission lost its quorum, which it did not regain until 2022. Sentencing Guidelines for United States Courts, 88 FR 28254-01.

During that hiatus, the Seventh Circuit, along with nearly all other circuits, determined that § 1B1.13 was inapplicable to motions by prisoners since that section addressed only motions filed by the Director of the BOP. The appellate courts based their reasoning on the fact that the Sentencing Commission had not updated its policy statements to implement the First Step Act. United States v. Gunn, 980 F.3d 1178, 1180 (7th Cir. 2020).<sup>1</sup> This left the parameters of what constituted an "extraordinary and compelling reason for release" in our circuit to a district judge's discretion constrained by the Seventh Circuit's forewarning that "a judge who strikes off on a different path [from § 1B1.13 as a working definition of extraordinary and compelling reasons] risks an appellate holding that judicial discretion has been abused." Id.

Another split among the circuits arose during this time over whether a non-retroactive change in the law might constitute an extraordinary and compelling reason for release. The Seventh Circuit ruled that such a change does not. See United States v. Thacker, 4 F.4th 569, 575 (7th Cir. 2021) (holding that a non-retroactive change to statutory mandatory minimum sentence was not extraordinary and compelling reason for relief under § 3582(c)(1)(A)(i) and that a district court cannot consider such a change, whether alone or in combination with any other factor, when determining whether a defendant has established extraordinary and compelling reasons potentially warranting a sentence reduction). As summarized by the Seventh Circuit:

When deciding whether "extraordinary and compelling reasons", 18 U.S.C. § 3582(c)(1)(A)(i), justify a prisoner's compassionate release, judges must not rely on non-retroactive statutory changes or new judicial decisions. . . . There's nothing "extraordinary" about new statutes or caselaw, or a contention that the sentencing judge erred in applying the Guidelines; these are the ordinary business of the legal system, and their consequences should be addressed by direct appeal or collateral review under 28 U.S.C. § 2255.

United States v. King, 40 F.4th 594, 595 (7th Cir. 2022) (cleaned up); see also United States v. Von Vader, 58 F.4th 369, 371 (7th Cir. 2023) (quoting United States v. Brock, 39 F.4th 462, 466 (7th Cir. 2022) ("Judicial decisions, whether characterized as announcing new law or otherwise, cannot alone amount to an extraordinary and compelling circumstance allowing for a sentence reduction")). In so deciding, the Seventh Circuit sided with a bare majority of other circuits. Compare United States v. Andrews, 12 F.4th 255, 260–62 (3d Cir. 2021) (holding that non-retroactive changes in law are not permissible considerations); United States v. McMaryion, 64 F.4th 257, 259–60 (5th Cir. 2023) (same); United States v. McCall, 56 F.4th 1048, 1061 (6th Cir. 2022) (en banc) (same); United States v. Crandall, 25 F.4th 582, 585–86 (8th Cir. 2022) (same);

and United States v. Jenkins, 50 F.4th 1185, 1198, 1198 (D.C. Cir. 2022) (same), with Ruvalcaba, 26 F.4th at 16, 26–28 (holding that non-retroactive changes in sentencing law may be considered in light of a defendant's particular circumstances); McCoy, 981 F.3d at 286–88 (same); United States v. Chen, 48 F.4th 1092, 1098 (9th Cir. 2022) (same), and United States v. McGee, 992 F.3d 1035, 1047–48 (10th Cir. 2021) (same).

After the Sentencing Commission regained a quorum in 2022, it promulgated amendments to § 1B1.13. See <https://www.ussc.gov/guidelines/amendments/adopted-amendments-effective-november-1-2023> (last visited July 22, 2024). Among these changes was the addition of two subsections, (b)(6) and (c), which "operate together to respond to a circuit split concerning when, if ever, non-retroactive changes in law may be considered as extraordinary and compelling reasons." Id. Subsection (b)(6) provides:

If a defendant received an unusually long sentence and has served at least 10 years of the term of imprisonment, a change in the law (other than an amendment to the Guidelines Manual that has not been made retroactive) may be considered in determining whether the defendant presents an extraordinary and compelling reason, but only where such change would produce a gross disparity between the sentence being served and the sentence likely to be imposed at the time the motion is filed, and after full consideration of the defendant's individualized circumstances.

§ 1B1.13(b)(6). This provision must be read in tandem with subsection (c) as follows:

Except as provided in subsection (b)(6), a change in the law (including an amendment to the Guidelines Manual that has not been made retroactive) shall not be considered for purposes of determining whether an extraordinary and compelling reason exists under this policy statement. However, if a defendant otherwise establishes that extraordinary and compelling reasons warrant a sentence reduction under this policy statement, a change in the law (including an amendment to the Guidelines Manual that has not been made retroactive) may be considered for purposes of determining the extent of any such reduction.

§ 1B1.13(c).

The Commission submitted this change, among other amendments, to Congress on April 27, 2023. See <https://www.ussc.gov/guidelines/amendments/adopted-amendments-effective-november-1-2023> november-1-2023 (last visited July 22, 2024). Congress took no action to specifically modify or disapprove of these amendments; thus, they became effective on November 1, 2023. Id.; see 28 U.S.C. § 994(p).

III. Discussion

A. Motion for Oral Argument

Mr. Taylor has requested oral argument on his motion for compassionate release. Dkt. 148. Having reviewed the motion and the parties' briefs, the Court determines that oral argument is not necessary to decide the motion. The parties have thoroughly briefed the issues raised, and the Court is prepared to rule on the motion. Accordingly, the motion for oral argument is denied.

B. Motion for Compassionate Release

To summarize the current state of the law governing compassionate release motions, a court may reduce a sentence "after considering the factors set forth in [18 U.S.C. § 3553(a)] to the extent that they are applicable," if it finds that there are "extraordinary and compelling reasons" that warrant a reduction. 18 U.S.C. § 3582(c)(1)(A)(i). Prior to the Sentencing Commission's promulgation of the current guidelines interpreting § 3583(c)(1)(A)(i), the Seventh Circuit had held that a district court has broad discretion in determining what constitutes "extraordinary and compelling reasons" under the statute. Gunn, 980 F.3d at 1180–81. The district court must "consider[] the applicant's individualized arguments and evidence," United States v. Rucker, 27 F.4th 560, 563 (7th Cir. 2022), but ultimately "[t]he movant bears the burden of establishing 'extraordinary and compelling reasons' that warrant a sentence reduction." United States v. Newton, 996 F.3d 485, 488 (7th Cir. 2021).

Mr. Taylor relies on § 1B1.13(b)(6) in his pending motion, citing the disparity between the sentence he actually received and the sentence he might receive if he were sentenced today, which he contends establishes an extraordinary and compelling reason to order his immediate release. Specifically, he maintains that the two stacked mandatory minimum sentences of 10 years and 25 years on his 924(c) convictions would be much lower today than they were at the time of sentencing. Dkt. 147 at 28.

The Government opposes Mr. Taylor's § 1B1.13(b)(6) claim on three grounds: first, according to the decisions in Thacker and its progeny, the Sentencing Commission in promulgating § 1B1.13(b)(6) exceeded its authority. Dkt. 153 at 15. Next, the Government maintains that this guidelines provision is invalid because it undermines Congress's established statutory scheme for sentence reductions. Id. at 27. Third, the Government contends that § 1B1.13(b)(6) should be deemed invalid because it violates separation of powers principles. Id. at 31.

We understand the guidance of the Sentencing Commission to be entitled to substantial deference, though that deference is not unlimited. United States v. Santoyo, 146 F.3d 519, 524 (7th Cir. 1998); Loper Bright Enterprises v. Raimondo, 144 S.Ct. 2244, 2273 (2024) ("[W]hen a particular statute delegates authority to an agency consistent with constitutional limits, courts must respect the delegation, while ensuring that the agency acts within it."). Here, given the Seventh Circuit's interpretation of the statute in Thacker and its progeny, the Commission's interpretation must yield to judicial determinations.

In Thacker, the Seventh Circuit provided a plain and unequivocal answer to the question of whether a statutory change "can constitute an extraordinary and compelling reason for a sentencing reduction" by stating that "[i]t cannot." Thacker, 4 F.4th 576. The Court characterized its holding as answering that question "squarely and definitively." Id. This holding has been cited and relied upon by our circuit in numerous subsequent opinions, including those cases which encompass new judicial determinations as well as new statutory changes. See, e.g., United States

v. Brock, 39 F.4th 462, 466 (7th Cir. 2022) ("Judicial decisions, whether characterized as announcing new law or otherwise, cannot alone amount to an extraordinary and compelling circumstance allowing for a sentence reduction."); United States v. King, 40 F.4th 594, 595 (7th Cir. 2022). Given these precedential determinations, we hold that § 1B1.13(b)(6) is contrary to statute and the Sentencing Commission's view to the contrary is not entitled to deference.

Our approach is consistent with that taken by other district courts in this circuit. See United States v. Garza, 2023 WL 7298975, at *1 (N.D. Ind. Nov. 6, 2023) (holding that the defendant is unable to pursue his compassionate release motion in light of Thacker without acknowledgment of the 2023 guidelines amendments); United States v. Black, 2024 WL 449940, at *12 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 6, 2024) (holding that the court could not defer to the Sentencing Commission's interpretation of statute and must apply Thacker).<sup>2</sup> Moreover, the Third Circuit has recently "reaffirmed that <sup>2</sup> The Court recognizes, however, that other district judges, including even within our own district, have found it appropriate to decline to follow Thacker or their circuit's Thacker-analogous circuit opinions. See, e.g., United States v. Spradley, 2024 WL 1702873 (S.D. Ind. Apr. 18, 2024); United States v. Bailey, 2024 WL 2291497 (S.D. Ind. May 20, 2024); United States v. Capps, 2024 WL 880554 (E.D. Mo. Jan. 31, 2024); United States v. Brown, 2024 WL 409062 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 2, 2024); United States v. Bricker, 2024 WL 934858 (N.D. Ohio Mar. 5, 2024); United States v. Skeeters, 2024 WL 992171 (E.D. Pa. Mar. 7, 2024). Recognizing that this issue is a close call, we acknowledge two post-Thacker developments below.

First, after the Thacker opinion was issued but prior to the enactment of § 1B1.13(b)(6), the Seventh Circuit expressly stated its hope that either the Sentencing Commission or the Supreme Court would resolve the circuit split on the issue, and, after the enactment of § 1B1.13(b)(6), recognized the rule on at least two occasions. United States v. Williams, 65 F.4th 343, 349 (7th Cir. April 13, 2023); United States v. Williams, 2023 WL 8868502, at *1 n.1 (7th Cir. Dec. 22, 2023); United States v. Moore, 2024 WL 890003, at *1 (7th Cir. Mar. 1, 2024). Second, the Government has consistently opposed a writ of certiorari to resolve the question of whether changes in law can be considered extraordinary and compelling reasons for a sentence reduction on the grounds that the Sentencing Commission should be entrusted with resolving issue. See e.g., Memorandum For the United States in Opposition to Grant of Certiorari, Thacker v. United States, No. 21-877, 2022 WL 467984 (U.S. Feb. 14, 2022).

These two developments may well signal that a change in the Seventh Circuit's position is in the offing, such that future rulings by the appellate court will take a different course, but for now, its nonretroactive changes in sentencing laws are not, by themselves, extraordinary and compelling reasons warranting sentence reduction." United States v. Kramer, 2024 WL 313389, at *3 (3d Cir. Jan. 26, 2024). (The Third Circuit acknowledged that it may later address the amended guidelines effect on the validity of its prior holding prohibiting a district court from such a conclusion where a case presents the question directly. United States v. Stewart, 86 F.4th 532, 535 (3d Cir. 2023).)

For these reasons, based on Thacker and its progeny, we hold that Sentencing Guideline § 1B1.13(b)(6) is not controlling here. Any post-sentencing changes in the law affecting Mr. Taylor therefore do not constitute an extraordinary and compelling reason for his release. Thus, Mr. Taylor's attempt to establish that an extraordinary and compelling reason exists for his release based on a change in law falters as a matter of law.

Mr. Taylor next argues that a combination of other reasons constitutes extraordinary and compelling reason to release him under § 1B1.13(b)(5). The sentencing guidelines permit a court to find that "Other Reasons" constitute an extraordinary and compelling reason for release where "[t]he defendant presents any other circumstance or combination of circumstances that, when considered by themselves or together with any of the reasons described in [prior] paragraphs, . . . are similar in gravity to those described in [prior] paragraphs." U.S.S.G. § 1B1.13(b)(5).

Mr. Taylor argues that the length of his sentence, his relative youth at the time of his offense, family support and a plan upon release, and his substantial rehabilitation while incarcerated combine to show an "other reason" similar in gravity to other reasons specified in the guidelines. Dkt. 147 at 30–36. With regard to his youth, family support, release plan, and the length of his sentence, each of these attributes of Mr. Taylor is shared with a large number of other precedent is clear, and our obligation is to follow it, which we do here in both our analysis and our conclusion.

defendants. Many defendants commit serious crimes at a young age and many are sentenced to lengthy sentences, receive long sentences, have family support, or have a release plan. Each of these are common among defendants, not extraordinary. For this reason, none of these reasons constitute an extraordinary and compelling reason for release whether considered alone, together, or in combination with any other reason.

Mr. Taylor is thus left with one final, potentially extraordinary and compelling reason for a sentence reduction: his rehabilitation. While the self-improvement and progress made by Mr. Taylor while incarcerated are, indeed, commendable, rehabilitation alone cannot constitute an extraordinary and compelling reason sufficient to warrant a reduction of his sentence. See 28 U.S.C. § 994(t); U.S.S.G. § 1B1.13(d) (Nov. 2023); United States v. Peoples, 41 F.4th 837 (7th Cir. 2022) ("We cannot read § 3582(c) to permit good prison conduct and rehabilitation alone to override Congress's determinate sentencing scheme. . . . [R]ehabilitation cannot serve as a standalone reason for compassionate release.") (cleaned up). Accordingly, we hold that Mr. Taylor's rehabilitation, whether considered alone or in conjunction with any other reason, is not an extraordinary and compelling reason to grant him compassionate release.

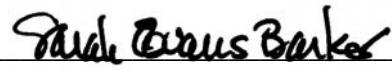

In conclusion, none of Mr. Taylor's grounds for arguing that extraordinary and compelling reasons exist warranting his immediate release are persuasive, whether considered individually or together. We do not address whether he would be a danger to the community or whether any of the sentencing factors listed at 18 U.S.C. § 3553(a) weigh in favor of his release.

IV. Conclusion

For the reasons stated above, Mr. Taylors's motion for compassionate release, dkt. [146], and his motion for oral argument, dkt. [148], are denied.

IT IS SO ORDERED.
